Kyriakos FORAKIS holds, since 2004, an academic post of Grade A Teaching Fellow in the field of "Theoretical and applied teaching of the French language" at the Department of French Language and Literature of the National and Kapodistrian University of Athens. He accomplished his higher education at the University of Paris-Sorbonne (Paris IV) where he received his PhD in French linguistics, in 2001. After having practised teaching and assessment at the French Institute of Athens, he has been elected at the department where he currently teaches French language and linguistics. French grammar and stylistics, history of the French language and study of interlanguage are included amongst his principal disciplines while his research works cover the following areas of Language Sciences:

- Study of modern French in its diversity.
- French grammar and stylistics.
- Diachronic approaches in French linguistics:
  - Study of classical and postclassical French.
  - History of the French language and of the French grammatical reflection (Grammars/Remarks, Port-Royal, School Grammar).
- Language diversity:
  - Study of the deviant language use.
  - Variation and French grammar.
  - Reception and conceptualization of the norm in French.
  - Language and style.
- Contrastive linguistic issues (French/Greek).
- Study of interlanguage and of the development of linguistic and metalinguistic competences among Greek-speaking users of French.

His works have been mostly published in France, Greece, Belgium, Germany and the United States. For more information, visit:
https://www.frl.uoa.gr/fileadmin/depts/frl.uoa.gr/www/uploads/gallika/CV/CVfr_Forakis_septembre_26.pdf